Cardiovascular disease is a leading cause of morbidity and mortality in the United States, Europe and many other countries throughout the world. In spite of the well-known adverse consequences, there have been few definitive conclusions regarding the effects of steroid hormones on the cardiovascular system. This is largely due to difficulties in the design of experiments and apparent limitations of the classical pharmacological approach, since clinical observations cannot be easily translated into valid information in terms of real cardiovascular physiology. However, data from a wide variety of sources would indicate that steroid hormones, which are among the most potent endogenous regulators of cardiovascular function, play important roles in the growth and development of the heart and, in older animals, in the recovery and repair of cardiac injury. Appropriate feedback actions of the heart on hypothalamo-hypophysial-adrenal-cortical control systems have been recognized. The consequences of altered adrenal-mediated secretion of steroid hormones, such as aldosterone, on the heart are most likely mediated by changes in cardiac function which act primarily in the vascular bed in the renal, mesenteric and cerebral circulation. But clinical and experimental observations of the effects of steroid hormones on heart development, growth and repair have begun to illuminate the importance of adrenal androgens in determining some aspects of cardiac growth.
