as such, the film is at its most engaging when its simply being what it is: a rollicking bouncy romp, the broad strokes of which bear that out, with attempts at deepening and examination making the feel clumsy or twee (with three of the four episodes clumsily using the plot as justification for offbeat cutesy moments). there are a handful of episodes that have moments that are self-aware of being geared towards children, and in fact are, but that tone is welcome and needed after years of the somewhat redundant and corny shrek films. its just one of the joys of a movie like this is that the characters are so perfectly designed that theyre both incredibly fun to watch and also completely suited to the whimsical tone of the material. the characters are so well honed, that its exciting to see that they can somehow also be perfectly silly at the same time. po makes is first appearance in this series as a present that master shifu gives to young po for his birthday. the birthday boy, however, just doesn't want it, looking up through his arms and eyes to glimpse an opportunity to return the letter-poem-turned-present. unexpectedly given a real gift, po takes it to his noodle shop, where he parodies the original presentation to customers, which is, of course, just as annoying to them, and everyone gets into a big uproar in typical kung fu panda fashion. that obnoxiousness just becomes the character trait of the entire adult po throughout the film. the adult po throughout this film is somewhat of a parody of himself, but thats not at all to say that its its own separate entity. the humor of the character comes in with his attempt to act like a proper adult, and that always throws him back into the realm of being the absurd, naughty, lovable doofus he is, instead of trying to be responsible, controlled and proper. that concept is just a constant thing through the series, and it gives the characters an important and inspired presence.
